Anne Brégeaut

PINEAPPLE THREAT

07/09 - 12/10/2013

« So what? » you might ask. Well, beyond the simple debate of classical versus modern, the question prompts us to consider dimension in the malicious (a malice without wickedness) works by Anne Brégeaut. So, are there two or three dimensions?

A fourth might better suit the eccentric mental landscapes into which the artist dives inviting us to do so too. This new exhibition by Anne Brégeaut at the Semiose Gallery, called 'Pineapple Threat' juxtaposes a large number of fragments each with its own story and opens windows on imaginary worlds each one as frenzy as the other. Frenzy in the figurative sense, a magnificent obsession very aware of how close it is to sheer madness – the psychological or pathological kind. It represents distorted thought, a psychic disturbance, it is a deformed perception of reality.

This is because Anne Brégeaut takes great care to deform and distort traditional forms of drawing and painting: she doesn't paint on canvasses stretched over a chassis, but on wooden boards that she cuts out beforehand, following her own intuition, in order to give them totally baroque forms – a phrase used to describe the irregular shapes of pearls. On these boards, Anne Brégeaut brings out mysterious scenes: a Venetian gondola lost in the middle of an ocean (The Mirage), a character sporting a pineapple costume terrified by a giant kitten (Pineapple Threat), that becomes detached on swathes of patterns in glistening colours. These backgrounds created by Anne Brégeaut evoke either psychedelic landscapes or flowery wallpaper or the pictures behind comic strips made in the 1980s.

The representation of houses is once more well positioned in this constellation of recent works.

In the Small Green Vase, a house with blue walls and roof is perched on the edge of the painting as if on the edge of a precipice, giving the illusion of volume. Volume is present in this work but in the form of a shelf prolonging the painting at a right angle: it is the support of an elegant small green vase, placed in front of the picture, its form coming away from the black background decorated with large pink flowers of the painted wooden board. Brégeaut stirs up trouble when relating scale to traditional hierarchy.

The work is made up of elements whose structure is completely illogical. Besides, Anne Brégeaut confesses to completely ignoring the rules of perspective, because she prefers a pictorial quality achieved thanks to the naïve and simplified forms she creates so as to indicate to the audience that this pictorial world does not conform to what it perceives as real but prefers to succumb to the desiring forces of dream, imagination and fiction.

In that particular universe, the pictures have abandoned the well-structured frames of geometry and resemblance. The works have been pierced with holes that the artist has outlined with bright coloured plasticine in the House in the woods: mental blocks, unconscious gaps, key holes or the white rabbit hole in which Alice fell.

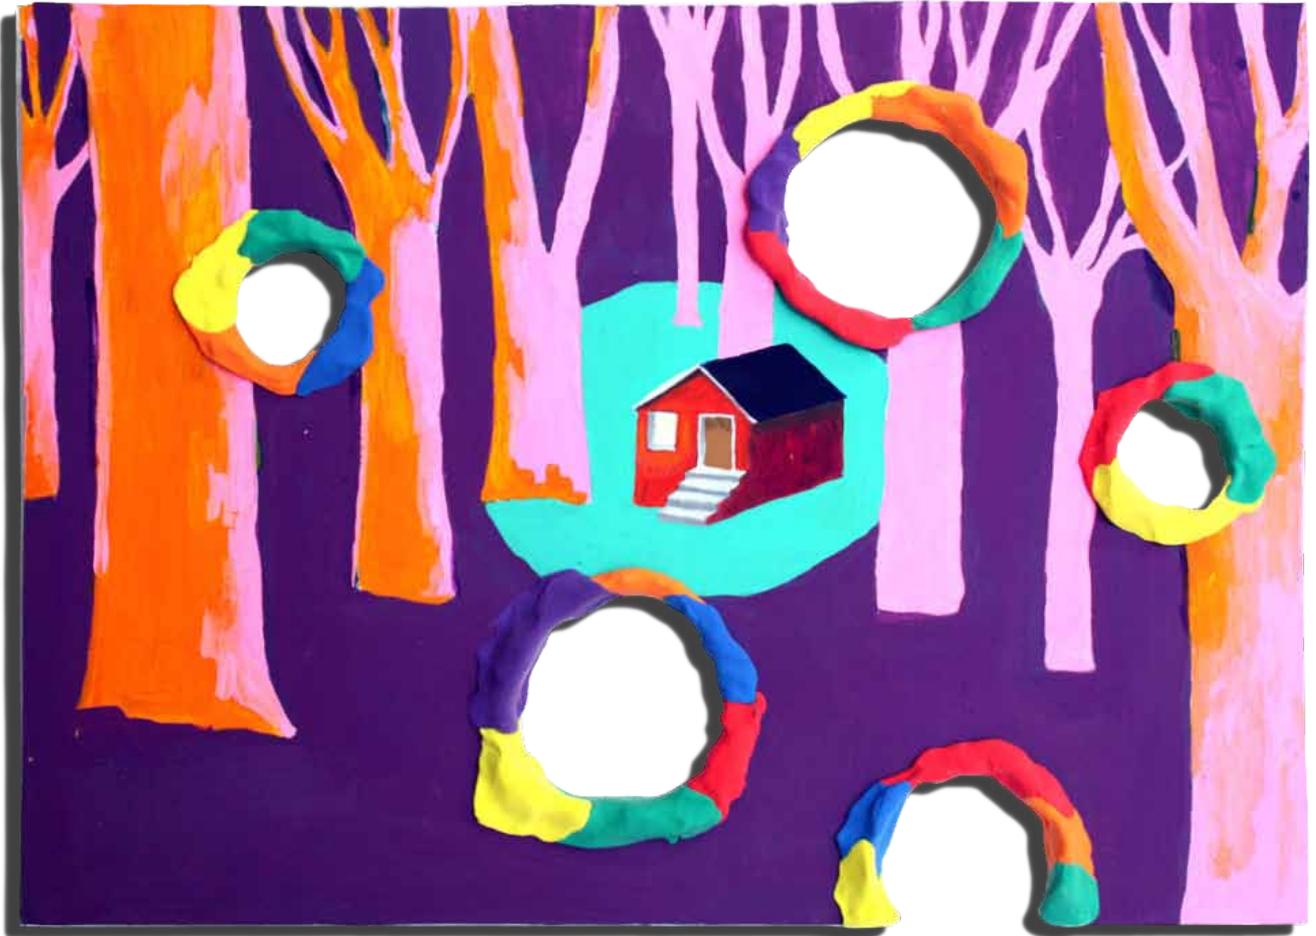

The hole in a picture is an obscure area, yet another clue given by the artist to point out the disjointed nature of these short stories that keep on echoing like refrains when the visitor has left the exhibition.

Anne Brégeaut has done a CNAP research residency in 2013 in Los Angeles. She has released a solo show in La Maison des Arts de Malakoff at the beginning of 2013, a solo show during the Fiac in 2010 and two other solo shows in 2009 in Le Parvis and Le Granit in France. She was exhibited at the gallery back in 2008 and 2011 and her works were displayed in many art fairs. Anne Brégeaut was also part of a famous group shows entitled 'Sweep me off my feet' presented at the Mac/Val museum in Vitry-sur-Seine, and exhibited numerous times in different FRAC since the 90's. In 2013, her works will be displayed in Kunstenfestival in Watou (BE). Anne Brégeaut's works have been acquired by several public collections such as Mac/Val, FRAC Pays-de-Loire, FRAC île-de-France as well as private collections.

This show followed a research benefit from
